In the 19th century, circus acrobatics became popular in Europe and America. The first modern circus was founded in London in 1768, and it featured a variety of acrobatic acts. By the end of the 19th century, circuses were touring the world, and circus acrobats were becoming some of the most famous and well-paid performers.

There are many different types of circus acrobats, including:

- Aerialists perform on aerial equipment such as trapezes, silks, and hoops.
- Jugglers manipulate objects such as balls, clubs, and rings.
- Clowns use humor and physical comedy to entertain audiences.
- Gymnasts perform on the floor, balance beam, and vault.
- Animal trainers work with animals such as lions, tigers, and elephants.

Becoming a circus acrobat requires years of training and dedication. Acrobats typically start training at a young age, and they must develop a high level of strength, flexibility, and coordination. They must also be able to work well with others and perform under pressure.

Circus acrobats are some of the most extraordinary athletes in the world. They put their lives on the line every time they perform, but they do it with grace and athleticism that is simply breathtaking. They are a testament to the human spirit and the power of the human body.
