

Hate New Music: The Classic Rock Manifesto

In the world of music, there is a growing divide between those who love new music and those who hate it. This divide is often generational, with older people being more likely to prefer classic rock and younger people being more likely to enjoy pop, hip-hop, and other contemporary genres.

There are a number of reasons why people might hate new music. Some people simply prefer the music of their youth, and they are not interested in exploring new sounds. Others find that new music is too loud, too harsh, or too repetitive. Still others believe that new music lacks the melody, harmony, and songwriting skills of classic rock.

Whatever the reason, the hatred of new music is a serious problem. It prevents people from experiencing new and innovative music, and it stifles the growth of the music industry. In this article, we will explore the reasons why people hate new music and why this is a problem. We will also offer some suggestions on how to overcome this hatred and start enjoying new music.

The Decline of Melody and Harmony

One of the most common complaints about new music is that it lacks melody and harmony. This is especially true of pop music, which often relies on simple, repetitive melodies and chord progressions. In contrast, classic rock songs often feature complex melodies and harmonies that are both beautiful and memorable.

There are a number of reasons for the decline of melody and harmony in new music. One reason is the rise of electronic music, which often uses synthesized sounds and drum machines that lack the warmth and organic feel of traditional instruments. Another reason is the influence of hip-hop, which often features rapping over simple, repetitive beats.

Whatever the reason, the decline of melody and harmony in new music is a serious problem. It makes music less enjoyable to listen to, and it makes it more difficult for people to connect with the music on an emotional level.

The Rise of Autotune and Mumble Rap

Another major complaint about new music is the rise of autotune and mumble rap. Autotune is a software program that can correct pitch problems in vocals, and it is often used to make singers sound more perfect. Mumble rap is a subgenre of hip-hop that is characterized by its slow, mumbled delivery and its lack of clear lyrics.

Both autotune and mumble rap have been criticized for being inauthentic and for lacking musicality. Autotune can make singers sound robotic and unnatural, and mumble rap can be difficult to understand and enjoy. As a result, both of these trends have alienated many listeners who prefer more traditional forms of music.

The Music Industry

The music industry has also played a role in the decline of new music. In the past, record labels were more willing to take risks on new artists and new genres. However, in today's music industry, record labels are more focused on making money than on promoting new music. As a result, they are more likely to sign artists who make music that is popular with the masses, even if that music is not very original or innovative.

The music industry has also made it more difficult for new artists to get their music heard. In the past, artists could get their music on the radio or on MTV, but today, it is much more difficult for new artists to get their music played on mainstream media outlets.

The Problem with Hating New Music

There are a number of problems with hating new music. First, it prevents people from experiencing new and innovative music. There is a lot of great new music being made today, and it is a shame to miss out on it just because it is not familiar.

Second, hating new music stifles the growth of the music industry. When people stop buying new music, record labels are less likely to sign new artists and promote new music. This makes it more difficult for new artists to get their music heard, and it leads to a decline in the overall quality of music.

Finally, hating new music can lead to a sense of isolation and loneliness. When people only listen to music from their youth, they miss out on the opportunity to connect with people who are passionate about new music. This can lead to a sense of isolation and loneliness, as people feel like they are not a part of the larger music community.

How to Overcome Your Hatred of New Music

If you find yourself hating new music, there are a few things you can do to overcome this. First, try to be open-minded and give new music a chance. Listen to new songs without judgment, and see if you can find anything that you like. Don't be afraid to explore different genres and styles of music.

Second, try to understand why you hate new music. Identify the specific things that you don't like about new music, and then see if there is anything you can do to change your mind. For example, if you don't like the use of autotune, you can try listening to new music that doesn't use autotune. If you don't like the lack of melody and harmony in new music, you can try listening to new music that has more complex melodies and harmonies.

Finally, don't be afraid to ask for help. If you are struggling to overcome your hatred of new music, talk to a friend, family member, or therapist. They can help you understand why you hate new music and give you tips on how to overcome this.

Hating new music is a problem. It prevents people from experiencing new and innovative music, it stifles the growth of the music industry, and it can lead to a sense of isolation and loneliness. If you find yourself hating new music, try to be open-minded and give new music a chance. Listen to new songs without judgment, and see if you can find anything that you like.

Don't be afraid to explore different genres and styles of music. And don't be afraid to ask for help if you are struggling.

With a little effort, you can overcome your hatred of new music and start enjoying all that the music world has to offer.
