

The Kindred Spirits River Return: A Journey of Healing and Reconciliation

In the summer of 2017, two Indigenous women, Sarah Jerome and Agnes Baker Pilgrim, embarked on a powerful and moving journey down the Athabasca River in northern Alberta. Their journey, which they called the Kindred Spirits River Return, was a physical and spiritual challenge that tested their limits and brought them face to face with the harsh realities of the river and the challenges of their own pasts.

Jerome, a member of the Cree nation, is a survivor of the residential school system. Pilgrim, a member of the Métis nation, is a social worker who has worked extensively with Indigenous communities. Both women have dedicated their lives to working for Indigenous rights and environmental protection.

The Kindred Spirits River Return was inspired by the story of two Indigenous women who paddled a birchbark canoe down the Athabasca River in the early 1900s. Jerome and Pilgrim wanted to retrace the women's journey as a way to honor their legacy and to raise awareness about the importance of Indigenous rights and environmental protection.
