

Translating International Law Into Local Justice: Chicago In Law and Society

International law is a body of law that governs the relations between states. It is created by treaties, conventions, and other agreements between states. International law is often seen as a way to protect the rights of individuals and to promote peace and security. However, international law can only be effective if it is translated into local justice. This means that international law must be implemented by national and local governments in order to have an impact on the lives of individuals.
